Citizenship rules cause brain drain

Todd Hooper, Washington

People seem to be getting the wrong end of the stick on dual citizenship. The debate is not about the pro's and con's of dual citizenship. It is about equality and stopping the 'brain drain'.

Australia already allows dual citizenship for migrants and their descendents (approximately 25% of the population). It doesn't allow it for native born Australians or their children however (the other 75% of Australia). That is simply unfair and the government should repeal the law. If any Australians have this opportunity then all Australians should be entitled to it.

Do we want talented Australians to move overseas and never come back? Of course not! Right now that is the sad reality for many who choose to experience the rest of the world.
